A design study for a deepwater port at Port Nicholas, St. Brendan, is published. No site has been chosen and no works have begun.

The founding team has published a design study for the St. Brendan Maritime Terminus, a deepwater port at Port Nicholas in the long-term Antioch plan.

The study sketches automated container handling, bonded warehousing, a renewable microgrid and passenger facilities. It is a vision for the future, not a project under way: no site has been chosen, no contracts have been awarded and no works have begun.

Any port would be built at sea, on platforms Aletheia owns, under international maritime law.
